TADEUSZ KOŚCIUSZKO

The great irony in the life of Tadeusz Kościuszko is that he was able to help the fledgling American Republic achieve an independence that despite all of his efforts was denied his own country. Like many Europeans of his time he was inspired by the Romantic philosophy of the 18th century and saw in the American struggle a revolution for all mankind. In the pursuit of his ideals and goals, he earned the highest regard of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson for the "purity of his virtue, the benevolence of his heart, and sincere devotion to the cause of liberty."

Tadeusz Andrzej Bonawentura Kościuszko was born in February 1746 on his family's estate in Polesie province (in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth), the fourth and youngest child. His parents, who belonged to the minor landed gentry but were not rich, gave him an excellent religious and patriotic education. Kościuszko was only 12 years of age at the time of the death of his father, a colonel of the Polish-Lithuanian army. Two years later, the boy had to interrupt his education at a school run by Piarist Fathers to return home to help his mother administer the family estate. In 1765, he was admitted to the newly established royal military school in Warsaw (Szkoła Rycerska).

After graduation, with the help of King Stanisław Augustus Poniatowski and Prince Adam K. Czartoryski, Kościuszko went to Paris to further his education and specialize in military science. In France, he studied engineering, fortification, architecture, and French philosophy.

Two years after completing his studies and returning to his native country, Kościuszko, disheartened by Poland's plight after the first partition in 1772 but inspired by American revolutionary ideology, traveled to America in the summer of 1776 to offer his services to the American army. He helped plan the fortification of the Delaware River and, on October 18, 1776, was commissioned as a colonel of engineers.

Under the command of Gen. Horatio Gates, he directed the fortification of Saratoga and contributed to the American victory there. Later he planned and supervised the fortification at West Point, where he spent over two years. In August 1780, after leaving West Point, Kościuszko was appointed chief engineer of the army of the South where he served under Gen. Nathanael Greene for almost three years. Kościuszko was brevetted brigadier general in the spring of 1783.

His eight years of long and meritorious service in America won him many friends, and he was invited to join the Society of the Cincinnati, along with Marquis de Lafayette and Johann DeKalb.

They were among the few foreigners admitted to the society of officers of the American Revolutionary Army.

In mid-1784 Kościuszko went from America to France and from there to Poland. He settled on his family estate and lived quietly until the progressive constitution of May 3, 1791, was abolished at the instigation of Catherine of Russia. Kościuszko took a leading part in the war of resistance against the encroachments of Russia, but his efforts were unsuccessful. The second partition took place in 1793.

Kościuszko issued a call for a national uprising in 1794 and led the Polish forces against Russian and Prussian rule in a gallant but unsuccessful rebellion. He won the battle at Racławice in April, but was wounded and taken prisoner by the Russians after his defeat in the battle of Maciejowice in October. The third partition in 1795 divided the rest of Poland among Russia, Prussia, and Austria.

After two years of confinement Kościuszko was released by Tsar Paul I, who succeeded Empress Catherine to the Russian throne. Traveling from St. Petersburg through Finland, Sweden, and England, Kościuszko arrived in Philadelphia in August 1797. He was received enthusiastically by the American people and his old friends and comrades-in-arms.

During his 10-month stay he and Thomas Jefferson shared many hours exchanging views and opinions and establishing durable links of friendship. Kościuszko entrusted to Jefferson the execution of his will and the management of his finances which represented his salary for the years of service in the American Revolution.

Kościuszko returned to France in May 1798. There he negotiated with Napoleon for the establishment of an independent Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. In Vienna he discussed with Emperor Alexander I of Russia the restoration of an independent kingdom of Poland. The failure of either emperor to meet his promise was a great disillusionment for Kościuszko in his later years, the last two of which were spent in Solothurn (Soleure), Switzerland, where he died on October 15, 1817.

The inscription on the badge of the Society of the Cincinnati, "Omnia reliquit servare Republicam,"—he left all to serve the Republic—is an appropriate tribute to Kościuszko.

Portrait of Tadeusz Kościuszko from a painting by Joseph Grassi redrawn by Jan Kurowski in Paris in 1840 and engraved by James Hopwood. Reproduced from Leonard Chodźko, La Pologne historique, littéraire, monumentale et illustrée, Paris, 2d ed., 1842.
